You Can't Beat the Hours: Umpires in the Deadball Era from 1901-1909 David W. Anderson

You Can't Beat the Hours is a look at the opening part of the 20th Century, when baseball was indeed "The National Pastime." It was a time when many times a single umpire was calling balls and strikes, making calls on the bases and often times had to get police escorts from the field when fans or players, or both, took issue with their calls. Umpires were a special breed and some men did the job, and others failed. You Can't Beat the Hours also looks at how the game was played during the early part of last century along with how umpiring became an honest profession. Sections of the book also looks at how umpires communicated with players, coaches and fans, why they wear blue, the umpires equipment and finally biographies of the 50 men who were full time umpires from 1901 through 1909. Four are members of the Baseball Hall of Fame, Bill Klem, Tommy Connolly, Billy Evans and Hank O'Day, but other umpires such as "Silk" O'Loughlin, Jim Johnstone and others are featured.
