Address of Gen: John O'Neill, President F. B (Classic Reprint) O'Neill O'Neill

Irish people for the freedom of their Fatherland. That such opposition should have come from the avowed enemies of Ireland, would be natural ;nor should we be surprised if we had experienced, at the outset of our work, a renewal of the hostility of those who, pretending to have the interest of Ireland at heart, have again and again assailed your organization, because your patriotism and self-sacrifice have been a reproach to their own selfish indifference, and the vitality and effectiveness of your action have more strongly demonstrated the emptiness and inutility of the political theories with which they themselves had long misled the Irish people, to their degradation and destruction. Such assaults have been so often met and repelled by the organization, that, at this advanced stage of our movement, with so many favoring circumstances to cheer us, and such staunch and energetic workers in the ranks, they would scarcely have attracted attention. But when a deadly blow has been aimed at the organization by men who not only profess to be friends of Irish liberty, but even to be members of and workers in the Fenian Brotherhood, such treason calls for the promptest repudiation and punishment of its authors. The open enemy can be met and repelled ;the treacherous ally may be watched and defeated ;but the faithless, pretended friend, who attempts to plunge the poisoned dagger into your back, while you are confronting both, in the discharge of the most sacred duty of patriotism, is a foe more dangerous than either, who should not be tolerated within our lines a moment longer than would be needed for his expulsion. The Constitution of the Fenian Brotherhood defines such conduct as perfidy; and as such it should be regarded, and treated accordingly. These are severe reflections upon the conduct of any member of our organization, and they are made with regret. B
