Yesterday: Otaakosihk Rita Holmgren Anderson

It all began in a little Northern Saskatchewan town... My hometown village of Camsel Portage wasn't much to brag about—no roads, no cars, no airport, no fast food restaurants or movie theatre. All we had was a cozy home with family and friends and nothing but time to spend with each other. But it was my best-ever hometown village. And so the story of a young Metis girl living in a remote Northern Saskatchewan Cree community begins. With a Swedish father and a Cree mother, Rita Gloria Holmgren began life with fascination. The houses sat on the top of the round bank in a neat row along the bay. The homes along the path ran along the top of the bank like clothes pins on a line linking us one to another. A log church sat in the middle of the village. Sitting at the table, you could see everyone and everything that went on in the village. We knew who were where and who did what when. Aunty Bertha was the town keeper and she knew everything and everyone. We were set in our ways. Every household had an outdoor toilet without toilet paper. You used the Sears and Eatons catalogs and you dared not take or use anyone else's pages. Growing up she learned her Cree culture. At a young age, she realized there are two roads in life. One road wide and well-traveled and the other, a narrow path and not many travelers. Life was not easy for Rita and her family. There were many obstacles and many things to distract her. Many times it was the people she looked up to who caused her to doubt and fear but she carried on. "So many times I felt I knew what was best for me and left the handprint of my strong will, not caring who it hurt and ended by hurting myself," writes Rita. "In my many struggles, I have learned it's not OK to be selfish even when you are hurt. I have blamed others for the poor choices that I have made and hopefully have learned from them. Sometimes it is easier to forgive others than it is to forgive yourself. But the best part in life is that it is new every morning. You can ask God to help you draw a new picture." Rita has come a long way since those days in Camsel Portage. As she looks back on her life now, she can see how Creator God had His hand on her, directing her every step. His Spirit used people to guide her in the choices she made and continues to make.
